The blessed news that there soon will be another SW fan among us is the only thing which makes the postponement of future issues of SE bearable. All our best hopes and wishes that your child will be bright, bouncy and Force-sensitive go with you, Cheree!

Are you preparing a list to contact when SE starts rolling again, and will you need SASE's? $ for postage? Whatever? Just let us know; mine will be in the next return post. For now, though, onto the comments. ((Ed: Of course, we know by now that SE will keep rolling. Though Jenni will be editting, I'll still be doing the mailing from my subscription file, and those whose subs run out will be notified as I always do, as soon as the next issue is ready to print.))

Jenni Hennig raised some very meaty topics and I've a few thoughts (hopefully intelligent ones) to share. I'm following the order and numbering Jenni gave in SE#14.

1. The seeming demise of SW fandom. This seems to be a matter which a lot are talking about recently. Is SW fandom dying? The first time I ever heard that question was a while back in STARLOG, and I think that it put the question into many people's heads. Some perhaps are answering yes to the question, while others may even say it is already dead. I disagree emphatically! Nothing that has affected people as much as the Saga has will ever die. SW has a strong following that won't let it--ever!

What we are seeing right now is a lull. Enthusiasm for things flow in cycles. A high point of intensity cannot be maintained, but rather will slowly diminish until something sparks it again and it will swing back up. You can see it in many things. The careers of musicians are classic cases. Elvis was on the top of the heap for years then began to make those crappy movies. Meanwhile, the Beatles invaded and captured the spotlight. In the late Sixties, Elvis staged a comeback while the Beatles drifted from our attention. Things cooled off a bit for both until the deaths of Elvis and John Lennon. Again, interest in them went through the roof (a sad postscript, but a fact). And there were lesser peaks and valleys in those two cases.

That's what SW is suffering now, I feel. Just a low point before another upswing. It's only natural. The last film was four years ago, during which time we've seen a lot of other great pieces of SF/F which we have enjoyed. Personally, I cannot remember ever being so high of STrek (due to III and IV) and have discovered Katherine Kurtz' Deryni novels. Both take some of my attention away from the SW universe. Not that SW has diminished, but now it must share my time with other subjects.

It is good that the question if SW's popularity may be faltering has been raised. It is something we should be consciously aware of. The most active members of fandom—the zine readers, writers, artists, editors, etc.—are the ones who keep the following alive by spreading their enthusiasm to other fans. Let's keep the Force strong!

2. Various authors and their stories. I've little new to add here on Jenni's second topic. The demands of one full-time and one part-time job have eaten into my zine reading time considerably. I mentioned some favorites in past issues, though (Cheree, Jenni, and Carolyn Golledge are probably my favorites).

3. The seeming demise of good SW zines. I was a latecomer to zines (post-ROTJ), so I can't say much about what was obtainable before. Of what's out there now--I think they are terrific.

- 4. The seeming demise of good SW stories/ideas. For me, it is the stories that make a zine, so with what I said above, obviously I am reading a lot of good ideas. As a writer, stories set post ROTJ I find more difficult to plot and structure than "fillers" between the films, so maybe this is what Jenni is referring to. Some of my favorite stories are post-ROTJ, though. Going past what the films have set up is the most difficult part of writing fan lit. It places the most demands on the author. While not all stories are great, poor ones that propose a future for the characters seem to really stick out. Fortunately, we have writers like Carolyn Golledge whose post-Saga stories are so very, very good.
- 5. The seeming demise of Jenni's sanity. What sanity? (Ha! Ha! Sorry, Jenni, I couldn't resist.)
 6. Not being up to date on my zine reading, I'll skip this topic on various zines and their themes, and move onto...
- 7. The splintering of fandom. Unfortunately, this is a natural growth. Not everyone likes all or the same parts of any one interest. Most obvious in the SW fandom is the fracture between Han fans and Luke fans. Fortunately, in SE it seems like just about everyone accepts each other's likes and dislikes and can debate not who is better but (and this is what's important) what makes each character unique, his/her motivations, meanings behind things, and all the rest. The lesson teaches itself: splin tering is natural, but not desirable. As long as we remember we are in fandom for the fun of it, it doesn't have to break down into "we" and "they" camps.

Thanks, Jenni, for raising those topics. Onto other stuff.

Maggie N.: I'm not adopted, but my thoughts about whether Leia would take the name of Skywalker are that, no, she wouldn't. The main reason is Leia's strong will and independence. She is her own person and the name Organa has great meaning to her. It tells a great deal about her--where she came from, how she was raised, and so on. It is very much a symbol for the rebellion, and I'm sure she takes great pride in it. She will probably keep it even after marriage. ((Ed: Not to mention the memorial it represents to all of Alderaan.))

Kerri Smithline: I think the Imperials had some system that would have enabled them to determine which pilots downed which enemy ships, and so could then tell if Darth was personally responsible for any "kills". In our history of military aviation, confirmation of victories has become very sophisticated. Even by WWII, wing mounted cameras were widely used, though far from universal. By the time of any SW type of technology (fantastical as it is), we would have to assume they'd have even better recording devices to determine if a pilot had scored any hits.

As for keeping up appearances, it is possible and would fit in with the Vader-as-a-double-agent theory. While I don't subscribe to the theory, I did want to point out Vader definitely has been responsible for the deaths of more rebels than Captain Antilles. That doesn't disprove the double agent idea for precisely your "keeping up appearances" reason.

Sandi: Good question about what Vader might have been like had he taken over Palpatine's place. First off, I don't think Luke would have become a Vader clone. Vader would have needed Luke to overpower the Emperor. To do that, Luke would have to have been warped into a state of some kind of perverted worship of Darth, through their father/son relationship. He would have voluntarily done Darth's bidding. My view of the relationship between the Emperor and Darth, however, is very much that of Master and unwilling servant. Vader does Palpatine's dirty work not because he wants to, but because of fear of punishment.

With that said, what do I think Vader's new role would have been? I see it as very much like that of the Emperor, but less active. He'd have his son elevating him to the status of near godhood, ready to defend him from any threat. He'd be able to just sit on his throne and become more and more lost and shrouded in the evil of the Dark Side, perhaps eventually even looking frail and shrivelled like Palpatine.

As for the question you posed to Vonnie Fleming, I've an opinion about who Vader is asking Luke to tell his sister he had been right about their father for. (Anyone follow my sentence there?) Was it conceited or to help her adjust to the knowledge her father had been the Dark Lord? I say the latter. He did not, I feel, have any idea who his daughter was, but had to be aware what hate that person would bear towards him. The only person who'd ever seen any good at all in him was Luke, and it is Luke who is Anakin's only hope of spreading the truth.

What is that truth? This is just one opinion, but I see Anakin as a tragic character. His fall to the Dark Side was out of weakness. He had great ambition to do good, and perhaps was overconfident. This led him to fall to the Dark Side, and once there, become Palpatine's pawn. Also, once fallen, I think the good side of Anakin had been only overpowered and held back, not wiped out completely. What Luke saw in his father was a man not inherently evil, but unable to resist the Dark's influence. Anakin, the good portion of that personality, would have known what his body was doing, but would have been unable to control it. In his last moments aboard the Death Star, Anakin would have been feeling the guilt of a lifetime of sins. I do not blame him for asking for Luke's forgiveness, nor for asking his son to share the truth with his sister that their father had in his last moments overcome the dominion of the Dark Side and ended his life with a noble act.

Lisa Thomas: I did consider the SW/ANH novel canon for years until I learned it had been penned by Alan Dean Foster, as Cheree mentioned. Up to that point, I'd always wondered why GL had bothered to change things from the film, and had finally decided the novel must have been written first, then the script was improved to its final, filmed form. When I at last learned the real author's identity, it made sense why the changes were there.

On some non-SW topics, I thought I was going to

On some non-SW topics, I thought I was going to be roasted for liking HOWARD THE DUCK, but was relieved to see others enjoyed it as well. Word is that it is doing all right overseas.

A while back, I recommended some pro-SF/F. Well, I want to plug one author's work again. Last fall I read the third trilogy in Katherine Kurtz' Deryni series, "The Histories of King Kelson". They are magnificant books. While reading THE QUEST FOR

SAINT CAMBER, I was nearly frantic in anticipation for what each next page would bring. For that feeling the only moment in reading that can compare is Frodo's approaching Mount Doom. The only sad news is that we have to wait until 1988 for the next trilogy to start hitting the shelves.

A Californian pen pal tells me that Star Tours at Disneyland is a real treat. She hasn't been through it personally yet, but a lot of her friends have and all have reported back very favorably. I hope that someday I'll be able to find out for myself.

Tim: Yes, it was me who mentioned Elvis a couple of issues ago (and this one). I LOVE oldies! My friends joke that if a song came out after 1970, I don't like it. Not true, of course. I like a lot of the music of the 70's to present, but prefer the classics.

It's time to wrap this LoC, and say "talk to you folks later," to all my friends I feel I've made, even if only at great distance. Keep well and keep the Force!

TRASH-THE-HERO STORIES

Barbara Gardner 617 Virginia Road St. Mary's, VA 15857

January 16, 1987

Hello, everyone.

Cheree, I'm sorry to hear that this will be the last issue of SE, but at least it's for good reasons. Best of luck to you with the baby!

Gail Small: I agree about your trash the hero stories. As long as the hero comes out somewhere near normal, I'll read it. Even if a character dies, I don't mind. I cry, but everyone has to die sometime. Luke, Han, and Leia are only human, after (One example would be A NEW CHALLENGE.) But I can't stand stories that leave the characters physically or mentally altered. One of the most horrible stories I ever read was one about Luke's mind being surgically tampered with by some people who didn't want their planet under the rule of the New Republic. The Force-reception center in his brain was destroyed. Han managed to rescue him, but only after the damage was done and the Force was gone for good from Luke. The story made me, literally, quite sick.

Lin Ward: Can't picture Anakin as a blond, huh? Well, you tell that friend of yours that I know a good number of blond guys (although none quite so tall as Anakin) who have deep voices and powerful personalities. So there. I can't picture Anakin as anything but a blond. And I can't picture Luke and Leia's mother as anything but a brunette. (I'll have serious acceptance problems if Lucas decides otherwise. But then, Anakin does have blue eyes, according to ROTJ.)

Matthew Whitney: I hate the term "fen"! I usually just say "fans". So what if you have to use your STAR TREK lapel pin with a hidden camera! I'll take photographs! I have a magnifying glass! It's better than nothing. I always translated Kenobi's "I cannot interfere" statement as meaning that the inhabitants of his plane of existence (immortal) could not intervene in the affairs of Luke's plane (mortal).

You like the Deryni, huh? Have you ever read CROSSED WIRES in SHADOWSTAR 12? (Why do I feel like I've asked that before?) I liked that story, and I'd never even heard of the Deryni. Luke crosses between dimensions due to a malfunction as he tried to make a hyperspace jump in his X-wing, and the Deryni have to help him get off their planet before he dies from some gas in the air that his lungs aren't accustomed to.

My copy of ROTJ is great, too. Nobody is squashed, the sound is just fine, and the colors are excellent—including Luke's very blue eyes.

Jenni: I'm not going to "blaze" at you. I agree. After four years with no new info from Lucasfilm to feed our fannish fires, those fires are dying. What surprises me is that few people try to get out of the rut. (I'm guilty of this, too.) For example, lots of people have started writing how-Anakin-fell stories. Why doesn't anyone write about a mission Anakin went on for the Jedi? Or his navigating days? Why don't more people write about the "little" people in the STAR WARS galaxy? (It's a big galaxy, after all!) They could write about a family's struggle to accept a son's decision to join the Rebellion after being raised on a pro-Imperial planet. That isn't creating an alternate universe, in my opinion. It's expanding on the one we were given.

You know, if the Fundamentalists ever did take over the government, or the Communists, etc., look me up sometime, okay? I'll be listed in government records as GARDNER, BARBARA A.: Wanted for treason against the United States of America. See REBEL ALLIANCE.

Maggie: I'm adopted. As I think I've mentioned before, my father disappeared into the military when I was 6 months old. About 4 months ago, I contacted him for the first time (without my parents' knowledge). Poor Lisa certainly knows about that. The call came while I was writing a letter to her, and the rest of what I wrote was probably half-coherent. right, Lisa? Anyway, I've been Barbara Gardner for 9 years now. That is my name, even if I am a Hollis by blood. Gardner is my dad's name, he raised me, and I'm his daughter just as much as I'm my father's, if not more. Anyone can be a father, but it takes someone special to be a dad. (Yes, Lisa, dad and I have resolved our differences.) Leia is an She's never been a Skywalker since she was Organa. born, and she wasn't raised as one. She was raised as the Princess Organa. In my opinion, that is who she is and always will be.

Han Solo and Carolyn Golledge: ALTERNATING BETWEEN THE FREEZER AND THE MICROWAVE???!!! UGGGHHH!! Vonnie, do something about them, will you?!

Sandi Jones: In answer to your question about the ROTJ scene with Han and Leia—a friend of mine once put it quite well as we were watching the movie together. "Hey! No more competition!" Maybe Solo suddenly realized that Leia really did love him alone, and that he would no longer have to worry about competing with Luke for her or wondering which of them she had really chosen.

Chris Callahan: I have that book that compares STAR WARS to the Bible, too. It's called THE FORCE OF STAR WARS and it was published by Spire Books, right, Bev? (If not, then there's $\underline{\mathsf{two}}$ such books in existence!)

Lisa Thomas: No, I didn't forget you. (But, oh, how I tried to!) Did my "friend" stop with those obscene phone calls? Raspy-voiced, heavy-breather, huh? Now I wonder who that could be? Ronald Reagan, maybe? No? How about Khadaffi? (Ha! Your description of this phone caller just reminded me of DARTH VADER'S DIARY. I hope Carolyn prints that article in SONS AND DAUGHTERS OF THE FORCE soon! You'll love it!)

Everyone: Lisa and I are proud (??) to announce the birth (hopefully) of a new newsletter, HIBERNATION SICKNESS. It will be bi-monthly, 16-20 pages per issue. Right now we need contributions, to get off the ground (poems, short stories, art, puzzles, and/or monetary). And interested members! So, if you can help out with above-mentioned contributions or would be interested in being a member, let us know ASAP! (Time is important, since we want our first issue out by April.) An SASE would be appreciated. Write to Lisa or me. Our addresses are in these pages.

Number 14 was another great issue! There is no letterzine like SOUTHERN ENCLAVE, Cheree; we'll miss it while it's gone, and eagerly look forward to it returning!

Lots of good ideas knocked around in this issue; some that I agree with, and some that I don't (I don't know which are more fun!). Jenni brought up some good topics, but first I'd like to address comments to some specific letters.

Ming Wathne: Yeah, I second your complaint about "the amazing black hole that ate my SASEs"! I don't think the situation is as bad now as it was a few years ago (or maybe I just send out fewer SASEs), but it also annoys me to see zines on sale--or, worse yet, sold out!--when I never received notification via my SASE. Sending a SASE to an editor shouldn't be like playing Russian roulette! I also dislike editors who sit on deposit checks for months or--I'm not exaggerating!--years before cashing them. Those little $5.00 gaps going through my checking account every month drive me nuts! For that reason. I no longer send deposits on zines, unless I really trust the editor. All I ask is that they cash the check immediately; if the zine folds and is never printed, they can just make me out a check from themselves for the refund. I'm sure we've all discovered that having an editor holding our deposit check does not guarantee we'll get our money back if the zine folds, anyway.

Carole Regine: I agree with your assessment of the aftermath of the great "trash Luke campaign" of recent years. It has made all of us who are even marginally Luke fans very gunshy of bringing up anything negative about the poor guy! We have hesitated to comment on Luke's many ambiguities and flaws--much of what makes him a really interesting and sympathetic character! -- because we didn't want to present any larger a target than he already was. I, too, am fascinated by the "Darkness" in Luke, his possibly less-than-platonic feelings toward Leia, his frustration at working inside the structure of the Alliance, etc. But until recently, to bring up any of these topics in a SW letterzine was like painting a bullseye on the poor guy and shoving him out onto the firing line! Let's hope all that is over now, and we can all discuss Luke's flaws as Luke fans (why should the anti-Luke fans have all the fun??) instead of being forced [hah!] to defend every little belch and scratch! Hey, maybe we can even discuss Han's flaws, as Han fans!? Would be great, wouldn't it?

Sandra Necchi: Hi, Sandi! Actually, I sort of like to annoy and alienate people...! Just kidding! I need all the friends I can get! Several things in your long and interesting letter caught my eye. I don't want to start a new anti- vs. pro-Spielberg faction, but I happen to enjoy most of Spielberg's work. Maybe I just love manipulative cinema? Being manipulated and knowing it, and enjoying it -- well, that's the basis of much of what's pleasurable in life (nudge, nudge, wink, wink, say no more!)! ((Ed: A wink's as good as a nod to a blind bat. Eh? Eh? Say no more!)) Seriously, movies like E.T., RAID-ERS OF THE LOST ARK, THE COLOR PURPLE, and INDIANA JONES AND THE TEMPLE OF DOOM have given me far too much enjoyment for me to "ignore" Steven Spielberg. ((\underline{Ed} : Not to mention CLOSE ENCOUNTERS, JAWS and even his early made-for-TV film, DUEL. I think about that truck everytime I get tailgated by a shudder))

Regarding turning a blind eye to fans who profit from fandom, specifically zine publishing--Sandi, I'm not ignoring them! -- I just didn't realize they existed!! If I'd known, I'd try to find out how they do it! I've been steadily losing money in zine publishing for going on four years now, with no end in sight! Are there really fans who are making money on this? How?? I agree with you 100%; anyone who is doing this for profit is not only treading on thin ice legally, but is morally skating the edge, since we are all winking at the copyright laws in this "business". If I were one of the legal copyright holders, I would be very upset to find someone making a profit off my characters and creations. I really didn't think this problem existed. What can be done? Boycott their zines? Turn them in? I think that would be opening a can of worms all of us could do without. All we need is to dredge up the same kind of paranoia that flourished during the great Lucasfilm flap! I think the logical starting point would be with the people who make this person's profits possible: the people who contribute to the zine, and the people who buy it. If you know someone is cleaning up on a zine, perhaps you should inform the people whose names are connected with it, and see if they are aware of it?

Kerri Smithline: I'm sorry to hear that you've been the victim of rumors in fandom. We are a pretty vocal and opinionated bunch, and some of us play fast and loose with the facts, so even if no harm was intended, I can see how stories get started. (I can just imagine what they're saying about me! Heh heh! Of course, some of it is true—but guess which part!) I know you can't always laugh it off, and it's not always a good idea to ignore it; but I would make an attempt to correct it whenever possible. Maybe we should have a panel at MediaWest where we can all stand up and correct our images? Naw--that would be too much like a Reagan press conference! ((Ed: Remember the old saw, Mary--"'Tis better to be thought a fool than to open your mouth and remove all doubt!")) Actually, since my "rumor image" is definitely more exciting than I am in real life, I think I'll let the gossip stand!

Your ideas on how Vader may have been biding his time, waiting to use Luke to kill off the Emperor, are fascinating. How about a story based on this?? There are a lot of unexplained things in the saga that would make more sense if Vader was saving Luke to kill the Emperor all along.

Barbara Brayton: If you think WOOKIEE COMMODE #3 offended you, wait until you see WC#4! The nude centerfold, the special "/" section, the "Trash Everybody" portfolio--oh, I'm just kidding! But it will be good--good and offensive!

Sandi Jones: I agree with your comments on Luke, Leia and the Force. It doesn't seem like the Force is with Luke much, until Ben tells him about it and it begins to manifest itself in him. It could have been the same way with Leia; until one is consciously aware that they "have" the Force, perhaps it stays latent. I think that scene where Luke informs Leia who she is, is one of the more poorly botched scenes in ROTJ. Some of it may be been editing, but the whole scene was awkward and stilted. It's one of my favorite scenes in the film--because that's all we get! But it could have been so much better. As for what kind of "mental gear shifting" Han was doing in that scene where Leia informs him Luke is her brother, I think that scene was a little awkward, too. It may be that it just takes him that long to stop thinking of Luke as a rival, and to make the necessary mental adjust ment to think of him as Leia's kin. From his slow uptake, maybe he was hoping Leia would choose Luke instead! Just kidding!

Jeanine Hennig: Hi, you little Sleazette! I love your "sacrificial" topics! All of them very relevant to the current state of SW fandom and SW zines; and all of them would make good panel ideas for MediaWest [hint, hint!]. Is SW fandom dead? STARLOG magazine tells us it is. But I think that SW fandom, just like G/god, doesn't feel it's dead. Maybe, like Mark Twain, rumors of its death have been greatly exaggerated! One thing to keep in mind: WE are SW fandom ["fandom R us"???]; it lives and dies as we choose, so it's not dead until the fat lady sings--er, until we say it's dead. I think the more telling question would be not "Is SW fandom dead?" but "Why are we letting SW fandom die?"--if we are!

I think your topics 1, 3, 4 and 7 are all related to this question. I speak as a SW fan, as a SW zine editor/publisher, as a SW fanfiction author, and as a fan of other genres as well. As far as I'm concerned, SW fandom is not dead—but it sure is changing! A lot of the "old guard" of SW fandom has moved on, either out of fandom entirely, or into other genres. Many of them just drifted out, but some have gone out with a bang—sometimes due to pressures in "real life" or problems with the fandom. For whatever reason, they're going or they're gone, and with them goes a lot of the "machinery" and the experience that built SW fandom up and kept it running so hot for the last 10 years [Zounds! Has it really been that long??]. We still have a lot of "newer" fans who have come into SW fandom in the last few years, and are relatively new to zines, cons. etc. Overall, I think the number of SW fans has steadily decreased since Lucasfilm has denied that there will be any more films. But there is still a lot of interest out there; and I think there always will be, even if there never is another film or book or comic. Heck, look at all the GONE WITH THE WIND freaks there are -- they even have cons and newsletters and hucksters--and all they had was one movie and one book, fifty years ago!

So, I don't think SW fandom is dead, and I don't even think it will die; but it will have to get a lot leaner and more committed if we are to continue to see SW zines, SW programming at cons, etc. I've mentioned before what I call the "Yuppization" of SW fandom. Lots of us have left active fandom, zine publishing, etc. to pursue the rest of our lives; we're getting promoted, moving, getting married, having babies, and—surprise!—generally unwilling or unable to continue to devote all this time and money to an endeavor whose only reward is emotional, not financial. Now I'm not one of these people, I hasten to add! I'm sitting in a career deadend, not about to move off the old homestead, receiving no proposals of marriage, and therefore unwilling to get pregnant! ((Ed: I find it hard to believe that men aren't flocking to throw themselves at Mary's feet--she's so gorgeous and talented it's enough to make a person sick!)) I'm still pouring all this time and money into the emotional goldmine! But--there just are fewer and fewer of us out there (This might be called the "Peter Pan Contingent" of SW fandom!)

On that happy note, I bid you all a temporary (I hope) adieu, and hope to see all of you again when Cheree can resume SOUTHERN ENCLAVE!

Thank you, Cheree, for all your effort over the past years! We do appreciate it!

Thanks to Cheree for publishing fifteen issues of SE. It's been a wonderful meeting place for SW fans and (as one contributor implied) a kind of "convention on paper" where everyone's been made to feel welcome. Some fans stopped writing to SE after strong and angry disagreement, but I never saw one line in SE suggesting that anyone do so, no matter how heated the arguments became. I've enjoyed sharing ideas, information, and just plain friendly chatter through SE, and I've made several friends through this letterzine... So, thanks, Cheree, and all the best to you and the baby!

Tim Blaes: You're welcome to join S.M.U.T.T.I. Gender matters not! As for initiation rites...as with many such groups, our ceremonies are secret. I can only assure you that the initiation will not involve your pancreas. On the "sister" and "sweetcakes" issue... I can't say I find those forms of address offensive. I'd have a helluva nerve if I did, considering how often I say to men, "Look, buddy" or "Listen, pal..." Apparently, SW characters aren't easily offended, either. Sweetheart, Flyboy, Kid and the Walking Carpet didn't let minor sarcasm stand in the way of friendship.

Carolyn Golledge: You were going to tear up "Above All Shadows"? Of all your stories, that was my favorite!

Matthew Whitney: You don't like the term "fen"? Uh...I'm glad you weren't writing to SE back when I referred to male fans as "menfen"! Aren't you glad that that term didn't catch on? I've just subscribed to the Trek letterzine INTER-STAT and a friend has given me about 20 back issues. I've noticed that you're a regular contributor. Just wanted to say it's nice to see a familiar name. Sort of like going to Outer Mongolia and running into your next door neighbor!

Kerri Smithline: Perhaps at the ripe old age of 37, my memory has begun to fail me. I remember receiving a number of long distance phonecalls from you, and I recall writing you a note explaining why I couldn't return long distance calls or correspond at length at that time, but I don't recall ever having received mail from you. We were once penpals...? Is it possible that you've confused me with someone else?

Jeanine Hennig: I agree about fanwriters who are so "in love" with a favorite character that they can't present him as a realistic human being, warts and all. About SW main characters and worn-out plots: Yes, there are times when I begin reading a story and I'm stopped cold by a powerful sense of deja vu and the feeling that I've shelled out bucks to read a tale I've already read a dozen times, but now and then, someone takes a much-used idea and turns it into a fresh, exciting tale. Just before ROTJ, I'd seen about half a dozen "thaw Han" stories; their abundance made me almost wish GL would leave Solo in carbonite. Then, along came what I supposed would be another clone of the stor ies I'd just read... I forced myself to begin read ing it and brother! was I glad I did. It's still one of my favorite SW stories. Luke, Han and Leia may go on too many missions, be caught too many times, but if they're accompanied by enough of a writer's imagination, that tired old idea may be turned into an attention-rivetting work of art. Sometimes I think that originality is not so much a matter of seeing "something new" as it is a talent for seeing something old and familiar in a way that no one's seen it before. (And speaking of deja vu ...I'm certain that last sentence didn't originate in my head! Must've read it somewhere.) On alternate universe fiction: Unless GL films the Third Trilogy, any story that picks up after ROTJ may be called "mainstream SW" since there are no Lucasfilm "facts" to contradict it.

Well, I'm going to keep this letter short just to be sure it slips in under the wire. Thanks to everyone who made this "convention of paper" so interesting. Hope SE will return to print soon!

Hello, all!

I must say that I was quite shocked to discover that SE#15 will be the last issue for awhile, especially since SCOUNDREL has also ceased publication. I am happy for you, though, Cheree, and I hope all goes well for you. I've made many friends through SE, and I hope that interest will not dwindle in the coming months before you're ready to pick up where we left off. At least, you waited until my subscription ran out, so now I'll have even longer to put off renewing.

Well, I'm sure that nobody missed the George Lucas interview on GOOD MORNING, AMERICA last week, but if somebody did, here is basically what he said when asked when we can expect the next SW film: "Well, I have no idea when the next one would be. I've got other things to do now and doing the next SW is a big commitment. It's at least 3 or 4 years of work—of your life, really—and it's huge amounts of money. I have to feel that I can tackle it, and right now I've got other things that I'd rather be doing, so I'm doing those things." Grrrr....

Call me ignorant (that's just a figure of speech, Gardner!), but I NEVER knew that Alan Dean Foster wrote the novelization for ANH. I've never even read the novel all the way through, even though I've had a copy for 9 years. I'll get to it sooner or later, but right now, I'm reading 3 novels at once for my college classes (all together now, "Awwwww...").

Gail Small: I also noticed the differences in HBO's, TMC's, and Showtime's presentations of ANH. One channel, Showtime, I think, also gave a different camera scope at the end of the awards ceremony than did HBO. The Showtime version showed only Luke and Leia after she had given the medals, but HBO showed a wider angle with Luke, Leia and Han. The channels also had different angles for the trash compactor scene.

Speaking of cable, I am not surprised that ROTJ will air on HBO this year, but I thought Spielberg might have been saving BACK TO THE FUTURE a little longer. Apparently not.

Lin Ward: I somewhat agree with your friend's comment about blonds. Sure, there are some strongly-built blonds out there, but dark hair and dark eyes make one look much more menacing, powerful, and mysterious than one with fair hair and light eyes simply because they give a darker appearance.

Matthew Whitney: So, when was the last time you went to watch our Celtics play? Even if you can't get tickets, you at least get every game televised. I only get what WTBS and CBS show. I could start a letterzine within a letterzine talking about the Celtics, so I'd better change the subject, but, if you ever want to talk Celtics basketball, you know who to write to!

Good point regarding Kenobi's "I cannot interfere" line.

Don't give up on Carrie Fisher yet! I just heard a few weeks ago that she is going to star in John Landis' new movie called AMAZON WOMEN ON THE MOON.

Jeanine Hennig: Don't you know that bribery is useless in this letterzine? (I've tried it before.) Cheree should have put your letter last for your implication that she could be persuaded by the use of pornographic smut! (By the way, do you have any Luke illos like that...?) (($\underline{\sf Ed}$: How 'bout it, Jenni? Got any more copies of FAR REALMS SEX and FAR REALMS SUX laying around??))

Since I'll probably never get around to LoC-ing ON A CLEAR DAY #2, let me say that I thought part 2 of "Martyr" was even better than part 1 (which was my favorite story in the first zine). You're not going to end it there, I hope.

Dr. Mary Urhausen: Thanks for getting WOOKIEE COMMODE to me so quickly. It's great!

Barbara Gardner: So you FINALLY got your title! Do you realize how long it took ME to get a title?!

Conspiracy?! (Cheree, we can't keep it a secret any longer. She knows.) Yes! It's true! Cheree and I have been working to keep you and Vader apart! But maybe you'll get him this time...(if not, contact Pat Easley for hints).

Since you mentioned "Papa Don't Preach", I can also see a link between Madonna's "Open Your Heart" and Han's feelings toward Leia before they finally got together--especially if you use the lyrics I made up for it.

And now, since I know that everybody is just dying of curiosity to see those lyrics (humor me, guys), then I know that you will be waiting on the edges of your seats for the premiere issue of HIBER-NATION SICKNESS—the new SW newsletter from the twisted minds of Barbara Gardner and myself. See Mos Eisley Marketplace under "Coming Soon..." for more details.

Back to Barbara: If Anakin/Vader was a Master when he fell, then why would he tell Ben "when I left you, I was but the learner, now \underline{I} am the Master". Of course, you could start with the Anakin/Vader being two different people, but I've never been convinced of that. I can't imagine that a Jedi Master would fall to the Dark Side (though I did write a story called "Yoda Has Turned to the Dark Side" a few years back, but, of course, I wasn't being SERIOUS).

Mary Keever: I hope you got my last letter, though it was en route to your old address about the time that you were moving.

And about those "lessons", where were you when Jenni, Sandi, and Sally cast a magic spell on the Luke doll? Maybe they'll tell you how they did it so you can cast a spell on yours...

Tim Blaes: I agree that DARK KNIGHT is well worth the price of $12.95.

By the way, George has his beard back now. I wish I had seen him without it. Never heard of "Sniffles the Mouse", though.

Kerri Smithline: I always just assumed that the other Rebels captured with Leia on the Blockade Runner were killed, even though there is no evidence of this in the film. Vader had no reason to keep them alive. I guess if he didn't kill them, then they went up with the Death Star. Unless, of course, they were sent to some remote planet working as slaves of the Empire or something.

I know exactly what you mean about a mundane's view of fanzine writing. I've encountered quite a few who gave that same reaction.

Sandi Jones: I'll send the next gullible kid with SW dolls your way!

Well, if this is to be postmarked before the February 1 deadline, I'd better go track down the mailman. Take care, everybody, and remember to check out HIBERNATION SICKNESS!

Beware of imitation Jedi Vice! (Why didn't you send a picture, Sally?) ((Ed: You should have caught Carolyn Cooper's Mos Eisley Vice costume at Conzineience last July--leather skirt, side blaster and dark glasses! A scream! Maybe I can find a picture of her to run in this issue.))

Follow the Force!

REBUTTAL

Tim Blaes Route 6, Box 294 Hendersonville, NC 28739-9659

December 31, 1986

I know most of you don't read comics and probably skim past when I talk about them, but I do want to share these things with you. Last issue, I made mention of the changes made in SUPERMAN and the polish made on THE BATMAN. Well, I have seen the first two issues of the new WONDER WOMAN comic and this is the best makeover of the lot. They have anchored WW much more in myth and history. They have also made her much more unique among the Amazons; she is the only one who can fly and do "bullets & bracelets". The editor is a woman (Karen Berger) and Gloria Steinem is an active influence. I really think you should check it out. End of unsolicited testimonial.

Cheree: If you are interested, I could send you the first two or three issues, if you send them back. And please don't toss any leftover issues of SE in the trash! My set is complete, but I just don't like the idea. Why not give them to the SW Fanzine Lending Library? ((Ed: Thanks for the offer, Tim, but I'm really not interested in comics. And the Lending Library will be furnished with copies of the back issues of SE, but they are going in the trash come June. My house is being taken over with boxes and I'd like to be able to move around again.))

Gail Small: I think you should keep in mind that you can't really know somebody from letters, or even from phone conversations. Nothing can replace eye contact or physical presence when building a friendship, or just trying to get a point across.

Has anybody considered the time-slip that a

Has anybody considered the time-slip that a letterzine effects on conversation? We are all talking at once and past each other.

Every once in a while, someone writing a comic book would write himself into the story, somehow, or yank some of the characters into the "real" world. DC even invented "Earth-Prime", which was supposed to be our plane of existence, but it got erased during the Crisis On Infinite Earth. Super heroes didn't do too well in our sort of "reality" and, when comic book editors/writers/artists ran amuck in their territory... How would you react if you found out some two-bit hack writer was controlling your life?

Jeanine Hennig: SW fandom is not dead, but it is delirious and may soon slip into a coma. Will any of you consider that the "seeming demise of good SW zines/stories/ideas" is because we have reached the limits of fandom? You aren't the only one who feels burnout. STAR TREK has almost always had some sort of input: paperbacks, comics, cartoons, records, and movies. It may not have always been the highest quality of input, but did help morale.

Look at SOUTHERN ENCLAVE. What are we still talking about: Obi-Wan's "point of view" and what did the face Luke saw in the Tree mean. And, as far as I can tell, we aren't saying anything new about these subjects.

Was the HOWARD THE DUCK comic you read black and white? I wasn't that thrilled with the b/w comic myself. Marvel's b/w comics line was supposed to be aimed at the "adult" market (kiddies are only interested in color, they think) and, as a result, it became less adult, in my eyes. Steve Gerber, the man who created the Duck and made him special, had a dispute with Marvel and left the company. He didn't have anything to do with the b/w comic and few other writers know what to do with the Duck.

Maggie Nowakowska: First off, thank you for being among the few who talk to me, not at me. also thank you for the card with the print of that Whelan cover I mentioned. There is a lot of nekkid beefcake on paperback covers (Boris is getting stale) and I am annoyed with the implication that all men are always ready for it and only interested in it. I think that what the media presents as attractive, "ideal" men and women is controlled too much by Hollywood, New York and the advertising industry. Many women I find attractive would not be presented so in movies. TV or ads. ((Ed: read something very heartening the other day that may be the start of a trend towards getting the "ideal" back to the way the human body is shaped. In a poll taken in England, asking who people thought had the best bodies, Princess Sarah--with her wide hips and curves--came in far ahead of Princess Diana, who people now regard as too thin and anorexic-looking! Maybe folks all over are getting fed up with trying to force their bodies into shapes they were never meant to assume! Let's hope so.))

I was up too late at night when I wrote that no one "knew" Batman & Robin were gay. I should have known better. But I think it makes my point strong er, in a way. Do you think B&R were harmed by the assumption on some people's part that they were gay? Beyond not being taken seriously for years, I mean. I understand that a Big Time TV evangelist once held up a copy of the X-MEN graphic novel, "God Loves, Man Kills" and denounced it as the work of the Devil. The X-MEN comic is still selling quite nicely, despite mediocre writing as of late. I really find it hard to believe that "/" fiction, as it exists now, can cause any trouble for us, or even say anything that the mundanes aren't already saying to themselves.

Dr. Mary Urhausen: I haven't seen THE EYE OF THE NEEDLE, but I have seen THE LEGACY, also directed by Marquand, and it didn't impress me in a positive fashion. It was really bad, and I think mostly what made it bad wasn't what happened, but how it happened. A good director should spot things that are illogical and remove them, not add things that are illogical.

Sandra Necchi: How could you conclude that Americans have no sense of humor from the A-TEAM? The show is nothing if not a comedy with "action" slathered in clumsy globs over it. It's the characters that are interesting; if all there was to the show were automatic weapons and stupid car crashes then it wouldn't have lasted a single season. (I only watch if off and on. A-TEAM usually took second place to what was on NOVA.) The first two HALLOWEEN films were quite good. You were probably thinking of the FRIDAY THE 13TH films. I haven't seen them and I'm in no hurry, but I hear that they have started to self-parody themselves with a sort of black slapstick. As for RAMBO, I'm not too happy about it, either. But rather than the result of lack of humor, anxiety was the nerve it exploited.

You should forgive Margie Abadie; the wit and wisdom of people who insult us, kidnap us, and kill us is easy to overlook. Arab terrorists would prefer to drink, meet girls, dance and enjoy life. At least, that is what one of them said to a hostage aboard a Pam Am jet held in Pakistan. Abul Abbas is such a wild and crazy guy! And let us not forget the comic genius of Muammar Gaddafi, Libya's answer to Milton Berle.

Your response to Maggie about the cause of the fall of the Old Republic could be best described as "my dogma is better than your dogma." I can't see as either one of you is "wrong", but ambition is a monkey wrench that has toppled many viable governments. Dictatorships flower because (a) somebody or some group screws up, and (b) somebody or some group is there to take full advantage of it. Case in point, the Nazi movement.

This is not supposed to be a zine for straight out political debate and, in response to some of what you said, I used a few sentences when I should have used a few paragraphs. But I don't think you "Best" is relative; listened to what I did say. DALLAS and the A-TEAM have had at times the "best" ratings, and STAR TREK never did diddly in prime time. National network news tries to get information as fast as it can and, for the most part, it does very well, but the world is too big to shoehorn into a half hour, and somebody has to make a choice what does and does not get on the air. In this environment, something has to give and somebody is going to gripe about the decision. The subjects and issues you seem to thrive on bore and depress me. If all the countries in the Middle East were TV characters, they would make quite a soap opera or a Harold Robbins potboiler--people all over the world killing each other in the name of God and Country; South Africa is America's "Kobyaashi Maru". I do keep up with things because they are a part of the world I live in. But don't expect me to dwell on them as if I were taking a college course.

If you had listened, you would have heard me say that those "alternative voices" you value so highly should be given more attention. If the Fox Broadcasting Company ever produces a national news program, they would do well to go where no network news team has gone before. I am less interested in what Libya or Iran have to say. 300 newspapers in a single city does not sound ideal to me; just how many of them do I have to read before my opinion is "informed enough"? You expressed the failings and vulnerabilities of our press very well, but you failed to convince me that anyone else is inherently superior. I have no reason to trust another country's press over my own; what passes for news media in most other countries is either a tool of the State or part of a culture drastically different from our own. (Incidentally, $\underline{\mathbf{I}}$ knew that the African famine was "old news". I may not read the same things you do, but I'm not as insulated as you say I am.) ((Ed: I have to risk adding a paragraph to Tim's argument and ask if all those alternate sources in all those other countries are available in English or did you need to learn several dozen languages in order to read them? How many do you read regularly? And how are the publications of groups hostile to their respective governments—and ours—any less biased than those put out by the governments themselves? I'm sorry, Sandra, but I agree with Tim that a grain of salt is called for.))

Sally Smith: STARLOG did say that they were planning a 10th anniversary STAR WARS convention. I wonder if they think they can get Mark, Carrie and especially Harrison. Can you think of Ford at a con? I bet he is thinking the same thing, so don't count on it. I asked Kerry O'Quinn if he would consider a 25th anniversary ST con on the East Coast next time and he said that would take too much money/effort to accommodate the other half of the country. Gee, thanks a lot, Kerry.

Barbara Brayton: My mother and a close friend disliked Vasques at first; too hostile, too "butch" for them, I suppose. But before ALIENS was over, they began to understand why I liked her so much. She wasn't just full of hot air, she covered everyone else's behinds. Incidentally, Carrie Henn is on my list of people I'd most like to see in Vulcan/Romulan ears.

Sandi Jones: How do you tell the good Historical Romances from the "Hysterical Romance"? As Cheree pointed out, the covers are almost all the same, and the titles sound as if they were assembled by a word processor: "Love's Savage Fury," "Savage Furious Love", "Furious Savage Love"... You want me to go on?

The obscurity of your comments to me in issue #12 were what set me off. It is irrelevant that no one else protested; they were not the one aggravated. You think an editor of a letterzine should censor any negative comments regarding him/herself, should prevent any complaints from going public? You can compliment the "Editor's New Clothes" all you want, but when s/he walks around in their un derwear I intend to tell them.

Chris Callahan: Michael Whelan is not sexist! His cover for Delaney's DISTANT STAR is a prime example. He was told to paint a male astronaut entering an airlock with a woman waiting for him in a nightgown with a drink and his slippers ready for him, or some such nonsense. Whelan ignored them and painted what he wanted to paint. They took it without a complaint.

Regarding the "Deadly Sweetcakes Affair" and related matters. After I had typed up that LoC, I reviewed it to make corrections and deletions. I had considered removing the Offending Word, feeling it was too glib. But what came out of my brain first was what I typed and, besides, I thought, these people know me, they wouldn't take offense. Famous last words. You don't know me and I don't know you.

Any of you heard of a game called Scruples? Let's play a short game of it, shall we? You are with several of your friends, some you know more closely than others but all of whom you respect. Just in passing conversation, one of them uses a term you find objectionable. What should you do: (a) shout in his/her face that they had better not say that again and toss in a sexually-oriented threat while you're at it; (b) say nothing until someone else does, because people are always braver in a group; or (c) simply tell him/her that you'd rather they didn't say things like that? This sort of thing has happened in the local group of SF fans I'm a part of and we usually take option "c".

ENTERPRISE: THE FIRST VOYAGE was the original title of what became ENTERPRISE: THE FIRST ADVEN-TURE. All of the pre-publicity used that title and I inaccurately used the obsolete title. They probably changed it when they realized it was not the first voyage of the Enterprise (or the first adventure, really).

Good luck on that first kid, Cheree. If it doesn't work this time, adopt a child. Nine months after the adoption is final, the twins will arrive. Murphy's Law can work for you. ((Ed: I'm happy to say that, as SE goes to press, I'm nearly seven months' pregnant and beginning to wonder if I'm going have to use a wheelbarrow to tote my tummy in! Everything looks fine and Junior Jedi is having a grand old time holding lightsaber practice in there! But I know what you mean about Murphy's Law--it sure worked for my cousin. The week they brought their adopted newborn home, Brenda learned she was pregnant; she now has two toddlers six months apart!))

CONFRONTATION

Vonnie Fleming 2/4 Cabena Crs. Chadstone 3148 Victoria, Australia

January 22, 1987

Greetings, Fellow Fen! Before I begin my usual lengthy ravings, I want to wish you all the best of the Festive Season (belated) and the happiest of holidays!

A big welcome to our new LoCers, Gail Small,

Margie Abadie and Ming Wathne!

Gail Small: I rambled on last ish about Ben's CPOV, and whilst I won't go thru it all again (I'm racing the clock, as usual), I'll attempt to comment upon some of the issues you raised re this. I beg to differ with you on the following from my CPOV, so please bear with me.

You said: "Those two old darlings knew exactly what they were doing" (i.e., Ben and Yoda). Of course they did. But I disagree that they were setting Luke up for premeditated patricide. Leia was not trained in the Force, so Luke was the only Force-wielder capable of confronting Vader. And I do say confront. Yoda said: "Vader you must confront"—not "kill". "Confront" can be taken any way you want. Ben interpreted it as "kill" but he hadn't had direct contact with Vader since the first Death Star. Luke had and would have been more aware of the changes Vader had undergone in the time between and would be better able to gauge the "good" in Vader than would Ben.

I think Yoda would've told Luke that Vader was his father after he'd finished his training IF Luke had stayed on Dagobah instead of going to Bespin. When Luke asks Yoda, somewhat stunned, is it unfortunate that he know the truth, Yoda clarifies: "Unfortunate...that not ready for the burden were you." This leads me to believe it's highly possible Yoda would've told Luke when he considered him "ready"—at the completion of Jedi training. After all, how could Luke successfully "confront" Vader if he wasn't aware of all the relevant facts? This would only be another "burden", in Yoda's words, and for him to go in unprepared would've been disastrous.

B & Y wanted Vader and Putrid Pal stopped because they felt what they (V & PP) were doing was wrong and Y & B had a moral obligation to the galaxy to stop them--not 'cos Vader was Luke's father, the "Jedi-gone-wrong". Ben thought Vader was beyond redemption and felt that to kill him was the only way (Yoda's "confront" is far more ambiguous). Ben felt Darth was too DEVOID OF HUMANITY ("He is more machine than man") to be saved. He regarded Anakin Skywalker (who was a "good friend") as Luke's father, not Vader whom Ben could only think of as a travesty of the man he once knew, whom he was certain "perished" in the molten pit. As Ben sees AS and DV as two different people in the same body (sorry, but it's hard for me to explain it clearer than that), he may not have regarded DV as Luke's father. To Ben, Vader was never a father to Luke, except in the physical sense. Follow up this angle and it's reasonable to assume that the word "patricide" never even entered Ben's head.

"...Those two old fossils were the worst villains in the piece..." Sorry, I don't see it that way. B & Y were under terrible pressure to make the right decision—the fate of the galaxy lay in their hands. Ben would be especially overcautious, after screwing up Anakin. He didn't want to make the same mistake twice. If you felt they failed Luke, I'm not going to try and convince you otherwise and I'm not saying that your view is wrong and mine right—to me, IF B & Y did the wrong thing by Luke, the way I see it, that makes them human, not "evil" or a pair of conspiring old villains. Remember, the road to hell is paved with good intentions. The "worst...villains"? Surely not worse than Putrid Pal! Nobody could be worse than him! In my opinion, that is.

You thought your "awful secrets" in your "mental closet" were bad? Wait til you finish reading this epistle of insanity!

Lin S. Ward: Am reading DRAGON'S TEETH and know what you mean with her portrayal of Ben. Agree we all have our faults--which is why I try to be care ful before pointing the finger of judgment at Ben, Yoda, Darth or whoever. I feel I'm not on stable ground to do so!

Thank you for your brief but consoling words re my sister—knowing there are others who feel for me when a tragedy strikes is comforting and reminds me that we're all part of a whole, aching humanity. It is caring people like you that give us the strength to pick up the pieces and get on with life.

Matthew: G'day! Gotcha letter, didya get my aerogramme? A long letter will be forthcoming when I get several hours of uninterrupted peace (a tall order here) to write. Glad you got more stories coming out and they just seem to get better and better...

Highly Secret Imperial Data (courtesy of captured Bothan spies!); the 6'5" black armored package was KIDNAPPED (stunned silence) by notorious rebel Carolyn Golledge! She put said package in the microwave and alternates with the freezer. And she wonders why the microwave packed up! To paraphrase Yoda: "To your Grand Moth do you listen!" I've told you, Carolyn, that microwaves are incompatible with the Power of the Dark Side! Now, get it out of the freezer (before it too goes on the blink) and send it down to me. (The package, not the freezer.) And to think I blamed poor Ronee! For shame!

Ming: Actually, I've conceived a story idea in which Darth is tried by the Alliance and he's just waiting to see which way judgment swings... You're right, if he didn't agree with their verdict, he'd made a break for it.

Maggie N.: Glad you liked my idea re Ben and the riddle (Darth says Ben always talked in riddles, as far as he was concerned! ha ha). I'm still a kid at heart and it shows! Which is probably why I thought of it. Whilst on the subject, here's Von's sick riddle-of-the-week:

What do you get if you cross Dirty Harry with Darth Vader? Magnum Force

("Force" as in "use the Force"; "Dark Side of...", etc. Get it?? Huh! AWWW, shaddup, Von!)

Carolyn G.: Hi, Mate! How did I come by the personal insight into Darthie? That's for me to know and you to wonder about!

As for the package, see Matthew's answer. Incidentally, d'ya know the penalty for kidnapping a Sith Lord??? You get to put up with my company for a few days over Easter! Think ya can bear it?

Agree about true survivors still having moments of utter, suicidal despair. I think, though, that Darth would be more likely to feel this way after his lava ordeal than after making peace with his son. The former situation would've made him very bitter, not to mention the agonizing process of recovery. Very good comments on the mindlinks.

Carole Regine: Liked your comments, especially about Luke's sinister entrance. Choking the guards —another Lucas "clue" that Luke was Darth's son? Will have to write a long letter to cover all the excellent points you raised.

Barbara Gardner: Please, don't ever be embarrassed about your comments! Hey, that's what a letterzine's about, DIVERSITY OF OPINION. Must admit, I felt the same way about mine in #13, particularly when I said I felt you under-estimated his courage. After sending the letter off and re-reading my rough copy, I thought it might've sounded a bit too arrogant: i.e., I may well be over-estimating his courage and I'd hate to sound as if I'm trying to "force feed" (no pun intended) my views on people. Different views give us a new perspective we'd never had seen by ourselves. And I'm sure Darth took no offense!

Lisa's SWT tapes sound wonderful. Tissue material, ya reckon? Just reading about Darth's passing in your letter, about the flutes and harps makes me go misty-eyed. Better stop, or this will arrive very soggy to poor Cheree!

All right, Ronee, what evil things have you been saying? I wanna know!

Tim: True, "/" fic can be weird! To me, I guess it would depend on how it was done. Haven't read any stories where Kirk and Spock come across as if they were lesbians, but then am not really into ST, so can't really voice a valid opinion in this regard.

As I've never tried my hand at writing "/", I don't know how they do it either! Maybe there's someone else out there who can enlighten us?

THE DARK KNIGHT sounds interesting, albeit expensive, and you've got me somewhat intrigued over the third Robin.

Agree about Vader restraining Leia. I thought she looked as if she were going to attack Tarkin/sabotage something, thereby getting into deeper trouble. Or maybe Vader just had to reach out and grab onto someone else for support (one of the rare moments he did reach out to another). This is compatible with my idea of him possiby being Alderaani—makes his action of grabbing Leia understandable.

Darth: How's the Netherworld for Dead Villains

treating you? Don't let Ben and Yoda give you a hard time, will ya? If they kick ya in the ectoplasm, just given 'em the metaphysical finger and tell 'em to fade away! Oh, and feel free to materialize in my humble residence anytime you like!

Sandi: Speaking as a dedicated fan of His Lordship:

- l. I tend to feel Darth wanted Luke to tell his sister more out of concern for the children he'd never really known (as people). Doubt it was conceit—not after selflessly sacrificing his life to save Luke. If he knew that Leia was the sister, he'd feel acutely guilty over her interrogation (in ANH)—of course, the whole business of him being father/enemy would be difficult for them both to grasp. Maybe he wanted to reassure the daughter he didn't know that he wasn't totally bad, that Luke's courage in confronting him wasn't wasted. But I'm slightly biased in Darth's favor, as you know.
- 2. Good idea of Vader's "true secret plans". As to the "feelings are clear", on the surface it seems as though the Emperor hasn't sensed Luke among the rebel strike team that he knew was landing on Endor. This puzzles him--why is Vader aware of Luke, if he can't sense him? I think, given circumstances and parentage, Luke and Vader were more closely linked through the Force than Luke and Palpatine. Which brings me to the ulterior message. Perhaps Putrid Pal was worried about the Forcelink/ Mindlink between Vader and Luke. He feared Luke's power enough to want Luke to "be turned...or be destroyed". Maybe he feared the bond was a sign of Vader and Luke possibly joining forces against him. Then I'd think there was an undercurrent of threat implied in Palpatine's words. "Are you sure your feelings...are clear?" might have been Palp's way of saying, "Just whose side ARE you on?" This would explain why he was so keen to have Luke prove himself by killing his father. If Palp had any idea of the offer Vader made to his son to share a galac tic throne, he wouldn't want to invite possible mutiny. He'd want to win over Luke (his biggest potential threat, in his eyes--maybe too because Luke wasn't dependant on life supports as was Vader and thus more difficult to control) or kill him. Remember, Palp was insanely confident re his hold over Vader -- insane enough to tell Luke to kill him, then turn his back on the Sithlord, as if expecting him to be loyal as ever. He'd forgotten Vader's indomitable will, the same will that compelled him to drag himself out of a lava pit more than 20 years before, the will that enabled Vader to save his son's life, when only moments before, the Dark Lord looked as if he hadn't the strength to save his OWN life, let alone anyone else's. Luke was right when he told Palp that overconfidence was his weakness-that weakness killed him. But I digress, and by now you're probably even more confused, mate!
- I sincerely hope that we will see SE again, but in case this is a historical moment when the last SE goes sailing into the sunset, I'd like to thank Cheree for the fantastic job she's done over the years providing us with a Forum for our CPOV's! And to congratulate her and her husband on the impending birth of their first child. I owe you, Cheree—without SE, I'd never have discovered all the friends I now have thru contact that SE provided. Thanks again.

Thanks to all SE contributors, for sharing your Certain Points of View. Thanks for the great article on Dave Prowse, much appreciated (to all concerned)! Thanks, Darthie, for gracing SE with your honored presence! To all—may the Force—Darkside

'n' Light--be with you always, and... Have a MOTIVADERED Year throughout '87!

I just had to get my act together and write a LoC to SOUTHERN ENCLAVE before its hiatus. First, let me congratulate you and your husband on the impending birth of your child. I'm the proud parent of a soon-to-be three-year-old daughter, named Darryn, who gives my husband, David, and I a great deal of joy. Parenthood can, I think, be summed up as the greatest joy and biggest headache you'll ever experience. Anyway, I'd like to extend my best wishes for a safe and easy birth and a happy and healthy baby.

On the subject of "Uncle Owen", I have a few words. First, while it would be interesting to know what the real relationship was between Owen Lars and Luke, I don't think it's critical to the story. (As for me, I just accepted the novel's version of Owen being Obi-Wan's brother. Tho' I must admit a weakness for the "Beru as Luke's mother's sister" version in some fannish lit.) I don't tend to be as hard on Owen as many other people seem to be. I see Owen as a hard working moisture farmer who's doing fairly well at his task. (I don't support the dirt-poor farmer theory. Τf that's true, how could they afford to buy Luke his own pleasure craft, the T-16, to shoot womp rats?) But it is hard work and he needs help. I think he harbors the secret hope that Luke will give up his dreams and take on Owen's own dream of building a prosperous farm. I base my feeling on this: Owen reminds me of my grandfather. He was a gruff man, mainly interested in his farm. My grandfather didn't mind going away on a trip periodically, but only for the day. He preferred to return home before dark. As long as I knew him he never spent a night away from home. I loved my grandfather even though we weren't much alike and I feel Luke felt the same way about Owen. Remember Aunt Beru and Uncle Owen were the only family Luke knew. It's also possible Owen kept putting Luke off about going to the Academy because he was afraid of what might happen to Luke if/when his true identity was dis-I can sympathize with Luke, too, in that, as a child, I always wanted to travel and see faraway places. Neither my grandmother or grandfather could understand that, but that was ok 'cause I don't have any desire to be a farmer. So, I don't feel Owen was guilty of anything. As far as we know, he and Beru had no other children so it's very possible he was looking to Luke to be his heir and take on the family business.

Margie Abadie: Hi! I must agree with your analysis of why DUNE failed. The lack of humor and mainly the inability of the movie to make us feel and care about the characters. I liked the casting of the movie, though, and I believe they could have done it, given a better script and more time spent on what the characters were all about. Those of us who had read the books had a definite advantage. Another thing I didn't like was the amount of screen time given to parts of the movie that I found bor-The scene showing us how the Guild member "bent space" was over-long. I also thought the final battle scenes were much too long. My husband's comment on this was that after spending that much money on SFX, he guessed they felt they had to use most of the footage in the movie. (The same problem the first STAR TREK movie had, as well.) To really do DUNE right, you'd need to use the miniseries format or a series of movies like SW.

Bev Clark: I agree with just about everything you said in your letter in issue #13. In fact, I often find myself in agreement with your letters.

Although I consider myself a Christian, I rarely find myself in agreement with the fundamentalists. Personally, I don't see a conflict in being a Christian and a humanist. I am utterly appalled when one "religious leader" (I use both terms loosely), says that God does not hear the prayers of a particular group. I would never presume to speak for God or to pass judgment on someone else as to where they'll end up. That's not my department.

Cheree: In issue #14, you spoke of your personal feelings toward God (in Jeanine Hennig's letter). That passage was just lovely and you said it better than I ever could.

Chris Callahan: I like Obi-Wan, too. his answer to Luke in ROTJ was a bit of a cop-out but I agree that it doesn't make him a bad person. Frankly, I think it's pretty silly the way people have turned on him. I often wondered if Obi-Wan and Yoda were the only other people, besides Vader and the Emperor, who knew that Anakin had become Vader. It's possible that everyone in the story simply thought that Anakin had died. That could be another reason for concealing the truth.

On ALIENS: I also really enjoyed this movie. The first one scared the crap out of me and I enjoyed this one more because it didn't. I knew what was coming because I had read the novel ahead of time. I scare easily and so I wanted to be pre pared. I was also unhappy they left the stuff about Ripley's daughter out of the film. I believed it would have added a lot to the story and the charac ter of Ripley.

Carol Peters: Good point about the other Jedi offspring. I've wondered about that one myself. If I were a writer, I'd consider it a good plot for a story.

Ming Wathne: As I've already stated, I agree with you about the Lars' moderately well-off status. Good point about the jeans, etc. Farming work clothes are usually pretty_scruffy.

Mary Urhausen: Hi! I go along with your views on what Ben meant about becoming more powerful after he died. I believe he was speaking of Luke and foretelling his defeat at Luke's hands.

I also go along with your views (and Cheree's) on "get" stories. It always seemed to me to be an excuse to bring two characters together. "He'd never look at me otherwise but if I nurse him back to health or give him a reason to live on, look

Sandi Jones: I'm another historical romance fan and I agree (gosh, I sure am being agreeable in this letter) that there are good historical romances out there. Sometimes you need to look hard to find them and ignore the covers. I'm a particular fan of Georgette Heyer. I get mad when people seeing me reading one make snide comments. They think all romances fall in the bodice ripper category, which simply isn't true. I hate it when people categorize stuff they're not familiar with. For me, a good historical romance has to have accurate history. It's annoying when that's not the case and will ruin my enjoyment of the book.

Well, I think I've said enough. I only hope this letter makes it in time for SE#15. I'm going to miss it a lot. It sure helped us keep in touch with what was going on when we were in Germany. We understand your reasons and you deserve some time of rest and peace with your child. I'm sure we'll all look for the return of SE when you're ready. I hope to see many of you at MediaWest. I'll be one of seconds-in-charge of running security at Media-West. Please say "hi" if you see me. Till then, Pax Vobiscum.

ANOTHER MOVIE

Well, it is with heavy heart, etc., etc. How can we survive without SOUTHERN ENCLAVE?! Augh! I suppose we must be thankful that we had it in the first place. Cheree certainly has done a marvelous job and is to be congratulated. Thank you...but please DO return!

In case you haven't guessed, I'm writing this white-rabbit style..."I'm late! I'm late!" Also extremely hare-brained. I'm in the midst of planning a trip to MediaWest*Con! Needless to say, I'm very excited...and also plumbing new depths of terminal poverty. And now Cheree goes and tells me she will be, umm, otherwise occupied at that time! Murphy's Law strikes again! What was that, Cheree? Murphy had nothing to do with your condition!? Oh, yeah, right. I don't suppose you'd consider delivering at the Con? Great for all those researching stories about Leia/Luke's wife giving birth. No, huh. Well, it was just a thought. ((Ed: I'm sure that would be better attended than last year's "Consumer's Guide to Smut" pane!!))

The GOOD NEWS! Oh, please tell me it's true! I did my bit and threatened to kidnap George Lucas' dog...and it seems he has responded. ANOTHER MOVIE! Way to go (at last), George! It is true, isn't it? If not, I don't wanna know! (Neither does George's dog.) 'Tis rumored Down Here that filming will begin next month (February). Saga centering on young Ben and Anakin. I imagine that means we will get to find out about the circumstances of Luke and Leia's birth and separation. Hold your hats, all you Anakin fan writers! Now we get to see who was closest to the TRUTH! May 1988. Oh, to see and hear that roll-up again! Only this time, Chapters 1, 2 and 3!! ((Ed: Come back down to Earth, Carolyn. The movie that starts filming in February is INDY III. But rumors of a new SW movie have been so persistent that I tend to believe that something's in the early planning stages, despite GL's denials.))

Well, after all that babbling, I hope I'm not wrong! On to another matter. I have not re-read my last SE, since I am outa time, but I seem to recall there was some mention of the reasons why fan authors write hurt/comfort stuff. Being an alleged expert in this area (Han claims I am...can't figure why!), I do have a lot to say on this subject, some of it a few people would definitely not like to hear. Since I want to present my case in detail and with some coherence, I will not burden you all (and Cheree's typing Fingers). I prefer face to face exposition on a subject which can by tricky. All I'll say here is that I'm in complete agreement that the \underline{way} I describe injury is well and truly overdone...but I will dispute to my (or Han's--ha!) dying breath that there were very good PLOT reasons for their inclusion. I do not believe the story would have been as suspenseful or moving without accident/injury. I do not like to write torture and have done so in only one very brief instance, with a minimum of description...and for a maximum of reasons. To me, a story can hold \underline{my} interest only if the central character learns and grows in some way. (Even better if several do.) It must not be just a physical adventure, but also an emotional/psychological/spiritual quest or trial. There must also be a central question/issue answered and resolved on both levels. Oh, heck, I'm raving, and I said I wouldn't. There were only two statements I wanted to make. (1) I admit I like to "mother", therefore Cheree's conclusions on this issue were close for me, but closest for me, was Matthew Whitney's idea. The element in all this is the challenge. The more difficult the situation for the hero, the greater the challenge and the more the author gets to play hero. Good fun! (A pain in the neck, too...when you can't find the answers!) (2) The other side of the coin. Why do some people prefer Mary Sues and some hurt/comfort? Is there anything necessarily wrong with either? Why the fuss? Are there stories which do not fit in either category? I certainly hope so. I would like to think that fandom can lay claim to the same cate gories as pro fiction, i.e., adventure, romance, thriller, drama, mystery, etc. I cannot see why whether or not the hero gets hurt/gets the girl should be so great a concern. It isn't in the book market. My opinion is that there is too much generalization and too much subjectivity (I think that's the word!) in reaction to fan fiction. Well, I shall now climb down from my soap box! Sorry. Any lunatic out there who'd like all four volumes, please send six blank tapes! As to Freud, I earned honors with a paper arguing that much of his theory was a load of twaddle. If you don't want to get further screwed up, I recommend (a) see a phenomenologist rather than a Freudian analyst, and (b) stop reading my letters!

Thanks to everyone for keeping SW alive! Cheree provided a major outlet for that endeavor. Thank you. Now for the reward!

First of all, congratulations on the expected baby. You and your husband must be very happy and excited over the prospect of having a child after trying for so long. My best wishes go with you and I'll keep my fingers crossed.

I will try to keep this brief, since I want to get it in today's mail so it will make your deadline. Yeah, time flies and I'm late again. It's been the story of my life lately. Anyway, it's been a pleasure receiving SE. Even though I haven't been much of a contributor letterwise, I want everyone to know how much I've enjoyed reading their letters. I've never seen so many sensible theories and downright good ideas anywhere else and, as Gail Small so aptly puts it, it's nice to be allowed to share these things without being made to feel that you're just a little, well, strange.

Sandi Jones: The calendar is great. I have it hanging in my bedroom right where I can see it first thing in the morning. Also, like you, I write for self-entertainment. I've done it ever since high school but never thought any of it was good enough to show anybody but a few really close friends.

Carolyn Golledge: When do we get to read about what happened on Ord Mantell? The idea of a Healer's Link is a good one. It really explains why torturing Han would bring Luke to Bespin on the run. Does it work both ways or is it only one-sided?

I second your motion—CROCODILE DUNDEE is terrific and a nice change from a lot of the junk that's been in the theaters lately. STAR TREK IV is closer to what the other three should have been. By all means go see MOSQUITO COAST, and not just for Ford's superb performance. This is a good movie, folks!

I was hoping to make MediaWest this year so I could meet some of you but finances don't permit (sigh). I don't even know if I'll get to the local con this year and Forrest Ackerman is the GOH. Oh, well, there's always next year.

Cheree, this is really an ad. I'm looking for copies of Martie Benedict's VHF tapes. She's informed me that she can no longer copy from her master tapes as they are nearly worn out from use. If anyone out there can help me, I would appreciate it a lot. I am willing to provide a blank tape for copying and will also pay postage. ((Ed: Hope you have a copy of her new release, GOLD, based on MOSQUITO COAST. She and her husband Zach O'Brien have done an unbelievable job on this one. Zach is a musician and added all his vast talents to Martie's. The result is a tape of extraordinarily professional music!))

The fanzine library is a wonderful idea. We who came late to fandom can certainly use it and will to the fullest I'm sure.

Thanks for providing a place where people like me can get a hold of information, ideas and just plain friendship. Even though I've never met any of you except through the pages of SE, I feel like I know you all. Thanks so much. Until later, fly casual.

Oh my oh my, it's February already. I can never meet deadlines when the holidays are over. January lowers itself upon us then and my body shouts that I ought to, begs that I must, grovels that won't I, pretty please—this year, at last—hibernate 'til March? Well, since this letter will appear sometime in the vicinity of blessed spring, I'll try to keep that season in mind as I struggle to squeak into the spring SE.

Before I get any deeper into this LoC, though, I'd like to thank everyone who has inquired about the SW Fanzine Lending Library. The best laid plans never shake down until in operation and your patience—as I rewrite the order form yet one more time—is appreciated! We're beginning to query universities and colleges about placing the zine collection; if anyone out there knows of a worthy scholastic institution with a SF/popular culture/women's studies library, let Bev Clark at 10501 8th Ave. N.E., Unit 119, Seattle, WA 98125 know. And a further thanks to those of you who have already made suggestions—we're working on them!

Lin Ward: I had to laugh when I read about your friend who has trouble picturing blonds as strong enough to be Darth Vader. Way back, when Dy Kirkland and I were hashing out the beginning of the ThousandWorlds universe, I wanted to make Darth blond, a big, beautiful blond. I thought such a description would be interesting among the dark haired villains I anticipated would appear as Lord Vader. Dy, and her friend Marti, who were much more into heroic literature than I, argued vehemently that Darth had to be dark; convention demanded it. I gave in since Dy was inventing much of the Sith background and history for TW. With the way things developed in the mainstream SW universe, I dearly wish I had stuck to my original idea!

Matthew Whitney: I find the term "fen" handy when LoCing; there's one less character to type. Aurally, I prefer it because the usual flat and harsh pronunciation of the "a" in "fan" really gets exaggerated in "fans". However, I don't like the way such language is used to exclude people, as 13 often the case among younger SF fans. I got into trouble with "fans" the first day of the '79 Seacon in Brighton, when a haughty young man informed me that I couldn't really be a fan because I hadn't used the word "fen" when talking about multiples.

Your interpretation that non-corporal Jedi can not physically interact in their previous world makes sense. I suspect Kenobi had to remind Luke that he couldn't help the boy on Bespin because it's so easy to imagine that such a mentor actually does interfere (such as when Luke blew up the Death Star I. All Ben did was encourage Luke to believe Luke could do it himself, but Luke could easily start to believe Ben did it. Sort of like people who say "God did this for me" when what happened was that their faith in their god enabled them to accomplish what they needed to get done.).

Along with Lin, you discussed Jedi children. I suspect the question must be based on which side of the nature vs. nurture argument a person resides. If Forceful talent, however much it may "run in families", is basically random in sentient populations, then the question of what happened to the Jedi children when the Empire came (as Lin asks) is not so great since, unless very young children are gathered together to study, there aren't any hard-core groups of "Jedi children" (save for direct families, which could be purged). I imagine older children, as in teenagers, would be miraculously transformed into adults in many eyes as soon as trouble hit, as often happens locally when such age groups get involved in crime, warfare, breeding, and other amusing adult activities. And, of course, in many societies right here on Earth, many young humans over the age of puberty or soon thereafter are considered adults.

As for how the young Jedi, whatever age, are chosen and trained, I admit my prejudice is that the subject of coersion simply would never come up. It is very difficult to coerce someone into enlightenment or telekenesis. You can put a veil on a girl and make her live in a convent, but that doesn't make her a nun, not really; nor can you use outside "force" to make a child a firestarter. Yes, you could surround a child with the Jedi philosophical structure and system, and assume s/he will accept it; most parents and relatives do just so, according to their own philosophical/religious lights, and find nothing wrong in such exposure. But a talent that blooms in the willingness to be quiet, to be passive, does not lend itself to the sort of unhealthy teaching methods we are all familiar with. Luke couldn't "force" his skills on Dagobah; and on Bespin he was most successful when he reacted, rather than acted. In Jabba's palace, he tried out a number of different approaches, mainly letting Jabba waltz into a self-made trap; the rights and wrongs of Luke's first attempt at situation manipulation can be, and has been, argued a long time. On Endor, he seems to have learned more about aware passivity, and it is only when the Emperor goads him into action on the DS2 that he loses it for a while.

And, since the Jedi, it appears, are free agents (at least they're not cloistered away), I doubt the children could be protected very long from the consequences of free will. For all the maneuvering Kenobi and Yoda work at, Luke is always free to say no, which he does on Dagobah. Right from the beginning, he could have refused when Kenobi asked him to leave Tatooine.

So, I don't worry about the youngers' education too much, and I do believe many of those already identified as "Forceful" were purged; those that weren't, but were left alone after the Empire's persecution of the Jedi, those born into potential but never trained, are probably waiting out there, wondering if what they remember could still live. Luke may well find his new Jedi among them, or if they are too tied to mundane existence by now, among their children and friends.

Jenni: Your questions about fanlit address perenniel worries about the subject. Is fanlit merely indulgence within another person's universe, a filling of the gaps necessarily left in the original narration, a stroking of emotions stirred by the original and still a bit hungry? If so, then I would suggest that fanlit does indeed have a natural lifespan with recognizable recipes for stories. If, as in the case of SW, a major plot development is a rescue, then rescue stories will predominate as the fans seek to recapture the excitement of the flight. If romance figures in the plot, those involved will be put through all the variations of a romance that the fans can imagine. Vignettes will fill in the places the original author did not elaborate; "what ifs" will pop up, and a variety of alternate story lines will appear for those who feel their "favorite" needs more/different/specific exposure. There is nothing wrong with this pattern of fanlit, but as you pointed out, it has limits, it runs out of gas, it gets repetitive. Just when this happens seems to be personal for the most part; Fan A is still going strong on SW when Fan B has read her last one-too-many Han/Luke/Leia Gets Rescued/Laid/Seduced to the Darkside story. Eventually, yes, more fans than not will be Fan Bs, and then the fandom for that universe goes into remission.

The alternate universes--stories that take the. original and build on it, developing plot implications and carrying them on to logical ends--often wander far afield from the emotional draw that the original had; to be a STAR TREK fan was not necessarily to be a "Kraith" or a "The Weight" fan. These stories are written not only as fannish exhultations of the original universe, but also because something in that original fired a creative spark in the alternate's author; something made that author try a hand at some secondary creation. These efforts of fanlit have their own breath or life, their own span of time to exist and entertain: and they can pop up anytime in the original fandom's lifetime, although they may not get the exposure they would have had they appeared in the beginning of a fandom's enthusiasm.

I'll go out on a limb and suggest that being a fan of the universe presented in an original creation makes an author more inclined to write alternates, while a fan of the original character(s) will follow the development of fanlit described first. One life (or two persons' lives, as in a romance) can only encompass so much activity, can only experience certain milestones once; can undergo just so many emotional crises before that person changes and risks becoming something other than what was originally admired.

If "And they escaped into the night sky, weary but alive" or "And they married and lived happily ever after" is the purpose of the story, there's nothing to write afterwards. Now, each of us has some kind of story that she loves to read over and over; nothing wrong with that. But greater fandom does move on after a while. On the other hand, if "And s/he was always searching for greater knowledge/another way to help/the beauty of each living day" for an example, is the goal of an author's exploration, the story will never end.

Carole Regine: When I first saw JEDI, the scene between Luke and Kenobi left me with the feeling that Leia was the one hidden because of extremely personal reasons. This is a subjective reading, and I offer it for simple mill grist, but I heard Guinness read the lines about Luke's sister with an emotional need beyond mere storytelling and interpreted it to mean that Kenobi's interest in the whole situation could be familial and on the female side; that Kenobi hid the girlchild with the Organas (aside from the appearance problem with Luke being the blond, like Anakin) because while it was too late not to avoid having one female of his heart hurt, he was damn well going to see the new one not have to get so involved. Rather than chauvanism, I hear personal identification at work, sort of a "my husband, but not my son", "my sister, but not my neice" kind of thing. If he were indeed attached in some way to the woman who birthed Luke and Leia, all other factors being equal, he would naturally more strongly identify with the girlchild rather than the boychild.

Mary Keever: I definitely agree that there is a parallel between the elder Skywalker and Kenobi.

Both men are tragic figures, one whose ambition nearly destroys even the last person that could love him, and the other whose pride nearly destroyed everything anyone he loved cherished; and both, one willfully and the other by omission, doing violence to what they (once, in Anakin/Vader) held most dear.

Sandra Necchi: Good letter! You're right, I do tend to romanticize the Republic. It's difficult to look at SW logically; for me, the allegorical/ psychological/fantasy/nonpolitical levels of the series interfere. I wonder--perhaps the term "Old Republic" means just that, an older Republic than even Kenobi or the elder Organas knew. Your scenario of the long decline fits SW exceptionally well, and dovetails nicely with Kenobi's comment about the Jedi in the "old Republic, before the dark times, before the Empire." I confess that I had always heard the comment to mean dark times = Empire, but it makes more sense that Kenobi's bitterness applies not to something that burst unexpected on the Republic, but something subsequent to (and perhaps made possible because of) the "dark times". An argument could be made that Kenobi had thought to revive interest in older philosophies through Anakins' strengths, only to be taken by surprise by the Emperor's appearance.

As for the presentation of the "bad guys" something occurred to me while watching TIME BANDITS. No matter all the nonfilm descriptions of Darth Vader and the Empire, in the films only Kenobi uses the word "evil", and he does it in reference to deeds, not to people: Vader has become a "master of evil". For all the presentation of the stormtroopers as efficient soldiers, they are just that --soldiers, not pseudo-SS sadists; and the officers we see through the series are remarkably personable for all that their appearances are fleeting. audience is definitely expected to come to negative conclusions through the Empire's actions, but I would like to suggest that all the support we have seen in fandom (and in the current government) for imperial weapons and behavior is a measure of how little harsh judgment is overtly presented in the

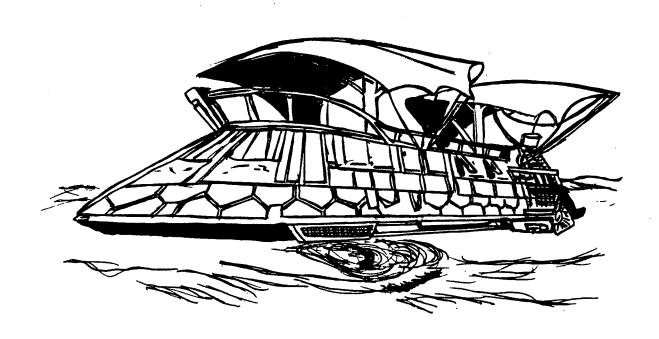

Saga itself.

The "evilness" of the enemy, the "this is what you must believe about these people" attitude, is rather, pounded into the audience's brain in many of the "high adventure/SF" movies subsequent to SW. I think TIME BANDITS brought all this to mind because that movie is all that more obvious in its point of view because it has the Christian God and the Christian Devil for main characters.

(There is, of course, the fairy tale/archtype argument, a la Bruno Bettleheim, that the enemy in such stories must be irredeemably bad [as representation of bad habits/darkside inclinations in a child], and must be totally defeated by the hero [the child struggling to control her bad habits/her own darkside]. And with such interpretation in mind, I can see SW in the late 60's. I don't mean to be cynical about that time, but in many ways that era was just as parochial about its enemies as the previous ones; what was different was that the enemies many Americans accepted as such changed. At last, yes, there were people who could comprehend that citizens of other political belief systems were "people just like you and me", but often those same enlightened people saw nothing redeemable, human, or worth worrying about someone declared a bigot, or someone who was Very Different in their political views. I am grateful for having been in college then; I do believe we all progressed in those days, but (IMO) there's too much idealization of the time.)

I do definitely think the title STAR WARS would have laid an egg! I saw advance PR for the movie and was one of those women (a la the Fox PR survey) turned off by the title.

Well, Cheree, that's all. I can't believe that I managed, even at this late date, to chatter on for five pages again. Arg. I hear Jenni Hennig 1s taking over SE during your busy days ahead. Cheers for the baby (and for Jenni)! I believe I heard s/he is due in May (er, the baby, not Jenni); great month. I'm very fond of it myself (especially around the 15th!).

CHOICE PARTS #2. Yes, folks, I know I'm crazy, but I'm soliciting material for CP#2. No due date has been set, but I hope to have it out sometime in 1988. This is a Harrison Ford zine just a bit more on the adult side. I want only very high quality stories and poetry. R-rated material is fine, but each story will be judged on its own merit. I'm not interested in "/" fiction, "get" stories or gratuitous sex and violence. I would like writers to stretch their creative wings a bit and explore some new territory with Harrison's various characters at the center. If interested in contributing, SASE Cheree Cargill, 457 Meadowhill Dr., Garland, TX 75043. ((And don't despair—TREMOR #4 will appear, but I won't start soliciting again for that until late this year or early next!))

ECLIPSE: A "Catalyst!" novella. What happens when a Jedi Healer loses the final battle with death? What could force the ultimate betrayal? And what could drive a young Jedi girl to rip open the barriers of Time itself to retrieve what she has irrevocably lost? $5 and SASE will insure your answers to all questions, and reserve your copy of this denouement to the CATALYST! saga. Galactic Winds Press and Graphics, PO Box 166362, Irving, TX 75016.

Real psychotic stuff. Cross-universe stories, What-If stories, parodies, humor, Twilight Zone-type twist endings, unusual angles, that sort of thing. We also need articles, reviews of just about any sort, and artists. We will consider stories of just about any length but we're not inclined to do continued pieces. VERTIGO will be about 200 pages, unreduced, with an estimated price of $5.00 plus postage, or less as we are aiming at the cheapest zine in town. Send contributions to: VERTIGO, Susan Kimzey, PO Box 875, Greer, SC 29651. Remember, if Weird has a name, it must be VERTIGO!
